Reported speech and conditionals in academic texts

Understand it

Academic texts often report other people's ideas with verbs like claim, argue and suggest. In Yes / No / Not Given questions you must decide whether the WRITER agrees, not whether someone in the text agrees.

Reported speech moves tenses back, and reporting verbs have their own patterns (suggest + -ing, advise + someone + to).

The rules

- Reporting verbs: claim, argue, suggest, state, believe, point out, admit, deny. The writer reports someone else's opinion.
- Reported speech shifts the tense back: She said, 'It is hard' = She said it was hard.
- Conditionals in texts show possibility: If emissions fall, the climate may stabilize.
- In Yes / No / Not Given, the question asks about the writer's view, not the view the writer reports.

All the words and forms you need

Neutral reporting	say · state · report · explain · describe · note · mention
Opinion	argue · claim · believe · maintain · insist · contend
Agree / disagree	admit · acknowledge · accept · concede · deny · reject · dispute · question
Patterns	suggest + -ing / that · recommend + -ing · advise + sb + to · warn + sb + not to · deny + -ing
Tense shift	is → was · will → would · can → could · has done → had done
Writer's own view signals	I · we · in my view · clearly · surprisingly · unfortunately

Where you use it

Reading: Yes / No / Not Given: who holds the opinion? The writer or someone else?

Listening: Speakers report what others said: The tutor said we should finish by Friday.

Writing: Refer to sources: According to the report, ...

Speaking: My teacher told me that ...

More examples

- Some experts claim that the method works, but the evidence is weak. (The writer doubts it.)
- The author admits that the sample was small.

- She suggested taking a different route.
- The doctor advised him to rest.
- He said that he would call later.
- Critics deny that the policy has failed.
