Article: Money matters: how economies work (184 words)

Whether a country is rich or poor depends largely on how its economy performs. Economists measure growth by looking at GDP, but ordinary families feel the economy through prices. When inflation rises, money buys less, and the cost of living becomes a heavy burden. In a recession, firms close, jobs disappear and a bankrupt business may leave many people without income.

Governments try to protect people through unemployment benefit and by managing consumer spending and consumption with taxes. A smart family keeps a careful budget, avoids unnecessary debt, and tries to invest when it can. Few people, however, can afford to buy a home without borrowing. Meanwhile a strong exchange rate helps importers but hurts exporters, and some large firms move their profit to a tax haven to pay less tax.

The most worrying trend of recent years is the widening gap between rich and poor. When wealth is concentrated in a few hands, an affluent minority prospers while others struggle to make ends meet. Most economists agree that growth is not enough by itself: it must trickle down through fair wages and good public services.

- For / good: Direct aid helps in an emergency such as famine.
- Against / bad: Long-term growth needs education, jobs and fair trade, not only money.
- For / good: Money pays for health, education and security, which are part of well-being.
- Against / bad: Beyond a basic income, relationships and meaning matter more.
- For / good: Teaching financial skills in school helps young people to budget and avoid debt.
- Against / bad: Rising tuition fees and rents make debt hard to avoid for many.

Speaking

Part 1

- Do you save money?
- What do you spend money on?
- Do you prefer cash or cards?
- Is it easy to save in your country?
- Do you think money is important?

Part 3

- Can money buy happiness?
- Why do some people spend more than they earn?
- Should the rich pay higher taxes?
- How will the way people pay for things change?

Part 2 cue card. Describe something expensive you bought. You should say: what it was, when you bought it, why it was expensive, and explain how you felt about it.
