The Man Who Could See the Future (Part 1)

Sardor was the poorest man in the town. He had a small house, a broken door, and a wife called Nodira who was cleverer than he was. One morning Nodira put an empty pot on the table.

"There is nothing in this pot," she said. "There is nothing in this house. Tomorrow there will be nothing again."

"So today you will go to the bazaar. Sit in the best place and tell people that you can see the future. Rich men pay well for that."

"I cannot see the future," said Sardor. "I cannot even see tomorrow." "Then we will be hungry tonight, and hungry next week, and hungry next month. Go."

So Sardor went. The road to the bazaar goes along the river. Halfway there he stopped. A brown horse was standing in the water, drinking. There was no man with it and no rope on it.

He thought about the empty pot, and he walked on. The bazaar was full of noise. There were sellers with melons, sellers with pots, sellers with sacks of rice, and all of them were shouting.

Sardor sat down on a stone in the corner. "I can see the future," he said, in a very small voice. Then a fat man with a black beard came running through the crowd.

"My horse!" he shouted. "My horse is lost! Find him for me and I will give you ten silver coins!"

Sardor closed his eyes, because he could not think of anything else. He moved his hands slowly in the air. He waited a long time.

"Go down to the river," he said at last. "Your horse is standing in the water, and he is drinking."

The fat man ran. Twenty minutes later the fat man with the black beard came back with his horse, and he shouted Sardor's name to every seller in the bazaar.

By the evening the whole town knew. By the next day the king knew.

Robbers had come into the palace in the night and taken every bag of the king's gold. The king's men had found nothing. So the king's men came to the little house.

"They say you can see what other men cannot," said the king. "Find my gold. If you find it, you will be richer than my richest man. If you do not find it, you will lose your head."

Sardor walked home and sat down on the floor. "It is finished," he said. "I saw a horse in a river. That is all I have ever seen in my life." But Nodira was already making a plan.

"Go back in the morning," she said. "Ask the king for three months, because a big job needs time. And tell him that a man cannot think when he is hungry. He must send us good food every evening."

The king said yes. That evening a servant carried dishes of hot food to their house, and they ate lamb.

In a cave above the old road, eight robbers sat around a small fire. Nobody in that cave was laughing now.

"The king has found a man who can see the future," said their leader. "Tonight that man is looking for us."

"Go into the town. Get up on his roof. And listen to every word he says."
